The Cyberdemocracy research group has been analyzing the last three Spanish electoral campaigns with a multidisciplinary and broad conception of Political Communication. This has allowed the group to provide a nuanced analysis of the media practices and the communicative tools used by journalists, politicians and citizens. With the current I+D Project "Practices and technopolitical profiles. Emerging notions of citizenship", the group will explore the technopolitical interactions among voters, candidates and social activists during the 2015 (6?) Spanish elections. At the same time, the group will continue the other relevant line of inquiry in which it has been working on since Víctor Sampedro's doctoral dissertation: the study of the uses and the communicative strategies of contemporary social movements, with a particular focus on the growing importance of ICTs and digital media. The IP's Ph D dissertation pioneered frame analysis and media agenda-building studies in Spain. Since then (1995), Cyberdemocracy has applied this perspective to the most significant electoral and social movements campaigns taking place in Spain during the last two decades.

The composition of the group has changed along the time but always maintaining a core of researchers lead by the I.P. Víctor Sampedro. Their impact is shown by the quality and quantity of their high ranked publications and contributions in academic meetings. The I.P. is member of some of the most prestigious editorial boards both in domestic and international terms. He is also a regular member of some of the most relevant editorial boards and committees encharged of evaluating academic excellence both for the public and private sector.

The group has also developed meaningful and intensive tasks of formation, always maintaining high pedagogic standards in graduate and posgraduate studies, not only in Spain but also in many relevant foreign centers. Since the 1990's, the I.P. and the rest of members have been teaching Political Communication and/or Public Opinion with their own handbooks, manuals and pedagogic resources. Most of them can be accessed in www.cp-op.com or www.victorsampedro.com. These sites, as well as the official site of the group (www.ciberdemocracia.com) have pioneered and practiced the open science and free access movement in Spanish academy. In this very same line, the group launched the first official postgraduate program which Masters class are free accessed by citizens either physically in MediaLab Prado (<http://medialab-prado.es/>) or online. In its three years of existence the Master's Program in Digital Communication, Culture and Citizenship (www.cccd.es) has become a reference of innovative pedagogy. It provides several offline and online platforms where to conduct collaborative research very much linked to social innovation and innovation. Some Final Master's Projects have achieved recognition and become real: <http://quehacenlosdiputados.net/>, <http://ccdemocraticas.net/> ... They can be considered practical materializations of the Group's conception of what Political Communication is (and should be). They respond to a clear academic commitment with the diffusion of knowledge to the point that professors and students of the Master's Program participate in equal terms in a collective blog published in a wellknown digital newspaper: <http://blogs.publico.es/el-cuarto-poder-en-red/>

Digital and international projection have been two distinct traces of Ciberdemocracia. In the last years, the group has strengthened its international relations with world leading centers in the study of digital communication from the perspective of social sciences. It's relevant in particular the Institute for Communication Studies of the University of Leeds (www.ics.leeds.ac.uk) that hosts the Center for Digital Citizenship directed by Stephen Coleman (<http://.leeds.ac.uk/research/research-centres/centre-for-digital-citizenship>). This other group gathers several leading scholars of five european countries: Kevin G. Barnhurst and Stephen Coleman (U. of Leeds); Leopoldina Fortunati (U of Udine); Birgit Eriksson, (Aarhus U.) and Slavko Splichal (U of Ljubljana). There exist former and strong professional ties with Pr. Barnhurst (who co-uthored four high ranking publications with V. Sampedro from 2002 to 2005) and with Pr. Fortunaty (supervisor of E. Trere's Ph.D. Thesis). During 2013 and 2014 Víctor Sampedro and the members of the team have held several meetings and workshops that culminated in a 2014 international meeting. From that event it emerged the idea of proposing and working on a common European Project within the Horizon Frame and on other collaborations and workshops, such as the panel "The Embodied and Digital Citizen: Communication, and Defining of the Good Life" at the International Communication Association that took place in 2014. Moreover, Professor Barnhurst is official member of the research team in the current I+D Project (CS02013-48612-C2-1-P) funded by the Ministry of Economy and Competitiveness. Unfortunately no Research Assistant was funded and that's a main reason for backing the candidate for a grant that will allow to continue and improve the above mentioned lines of research and formation projects.

The activities of the candidate Dr. Emiliano Treré within the Cyberdemocracy research group should be thought in this scenario. Dr. Treré will (1) greatly contribute with his expertise in technopolitics, digital media and social movements and his international experience to the development of the current I+D project; (2) contribute to the managing, strengthening and internationalization of the activities of the 'Master in Communication and Digital Citizenship', and (3) he finally will work on the European Project Horizon lead by the University of Leeds which was rejected (with a very high grade) but will be presented again in the 2015 call.
